

SUPER PACS AND THE 2012 PRESIDENTIAL ELECTION: WHAT HAPPENED? WHAT'S IN STORE?

MICHAEL BECKEL*

WHAT IS A SUPER PAC?

The term originated in 2010, when a new breed of political animal arose on the campaign finance landscape in the aftermath of the U.S. Super PACs. These committees are able to raise unlimited amounts of money from individuals, corporations, unions, and other organizations.

What really makes these new committees special is their ability to coordinate with candidates and other political groups.

Martha Coakley, who eventually lost to Republican Scott Brown by five percentage points.

Ultimately, the top dog in the super PAC game in 2010 was American Crossroads, the conservative group that was co-founded by GOP strategists Karl Rove and Ed Gillespie. Its approximately $28 million in revenue accounted for about one-third of all super PAC receipts.

Women Vote!, by contrast, raised $6.5 million.

Fast-forward two years and American Crossroads ranked as the number two super PAC in terms of both fundraising and expenditures during the 2012 election cycle, being eclipsed only by Restore Our Future, the main super PAC that supported Republican Mitt Romney's unsuccessful presidential bid. According to the Sunlight Foundation, both groups spent more than 90 percent of their money on negative ads ahead of the November 2012 election. negative ads, not less. He wrote:

Elections present a mutually exclusive choice. It is legal to buy a can of Coke and a can of Pepsi on the same day, but you can't vote for Obama and Romney in the same election. That mutual exclusivity pushes campaigns to frame the choice more sharply. Imagine if we had Cola Day once every four years—and you were stuck with your choice for those four years. Coke would say Pepsi makes you fat; Pepsi would counterattack that Coke makes you impotent. And they'd go downhill from there.

According to the Wesleyan Media Project's analysis of data from Kantar Media/C MAG, the Obama campaign aired some 503,255 ads between April 11, 2012, and October 29, 2012. Rom donors. So far, limited contributions have been received from individuals, foundations, and corporations. The group has raised $154,000, and is aiming for $200,000 by the end of the year. The group's goal is to help the nonprofit to become flush with the funds necessary to launch an advertising blitz. This worries many incumbent politicians, who were afraid of the group's influence.

STEALTH SUPER PAC ACTIVITY

Some have posited that fans of political transparency should be big fans of super PACs because they are required to disclose their funders. But under the existing campaign finance reporting regime, there are still ways for super PACs to be active in races without revealing their donors before people head to the polls. This is particularly true for super PACs that are created late in the game—or that surge to life during the final stretch of a campaign. Current campaign finance rules require near-immediate disclosure of expenditures, via 48-hour or 24-hour notices filed with the FEC. But real-time reporting of super PAC funders is not required.

During the 2012 Republican presidential primaries, several major super PACs changed the frequency at which they filed reports with the FEC. In practice, this meant that they were allotted a few more weeks before information about their funders was required to be disclosed—a time during which people were casting their votes or attending caucuses in Iowa, New Hampshire, Nevada, South Carolina, and Florida. A similar situation could play out again in early 2016, assuming states continue to hold nomination contests in January. Depending on the weight of these early contests, voters could essentially determine the nominees of both major parties before the general public knows who funded the super PAC cavalries of each candidate that are all-but-certain to exist.

Already amid multiple contests in 2013, we have seen super PACs pop up ahead of elections and make last-minute expenditures to help get out the vote for their preferred candidates—all while keeping their funders’ identities secret until after votes are cast.

Even though railing against those who are trying to “buy” an election makes for good talking points on either side of the partisan divide, neither side, as operatives on both sides often say, wants to “unilaterally disarm” or “fight with one hand tied behind their backs.”

At this juncture, one thing appears certain: Super PACs of all stripes are unlikely to go away any time soon.
